

How to Launch Paid Ads From Zero

My step-by-step checklist for going from $0 to profitable on paid.

Quick heads up before you read this.

When I say "from zero," I don't mean from nothing.

I mean you've already done deals. You've got an offer that works, people are paying you for it, and now you want to scale it with paid ads.

If that's you, this is everything. Step by step.

If you haven't sold anything yet, this isn't for you.

Ads don't fix a broken offer. They just hand your money to the casino faster.

Get the offer working first on organic, then come back.

Let's get started.

Step 1. Get your offer ready for cold traffic

| Your warm audience forgives a weak offer. Cold traffic won't.

Here's the thing nobody tells you.

Your warm audience buys because they trust you. They know you, they've seen your stuff, they're basically already sold.

Cold traffic doesn't know you from anyone.

They see your ad, they've got zero reason to care, and you've got about two seconds before they scroll past.

So before you spend a dollar, you sharpen the offer until it can stand on its own in front of a total stranger.

Run down this list:

- ☐ Pick one buyer. Not three. The one you actually want more of.
- ☐ Pick the one problem that keeps them up at night.
- ☐ Pick the one result they'd pay almost anything to get.
- ☐ Write down what they've already tried and why it didn't work. That right there is your "we're different" angle.
- ☐ Give your way of doing it a simple name they'll remember.
- ☐ List exactly what they get, in plain English. No "support," no "access." Nobody can picture that.
- ☐ Get proof from people who look just like them. Ten people they relate to beats one big name.
- ☐ Price it like the best option in the room, not the cheapest.
- ☐ Make sure the offer itself is different from everyone else's in your market.

That last one is the big one, so don't skip past it.

Look at what everyone else in your market is selling.

If your offer is the same as theirs, the only way to win is to out-market and out-sell them. That's a grind, and it never stops.

Make the offer itself different, and you win before the ad even runs.

Say everyone in your space sells coaching, or done-with-you. You come in done-for-you.

Now you're not the better option. You're the only option for the people who want it handled.

A different offer beats better marketing every time.

Here's how you know it's ready.

You can say the whole offer in one sentence, and a stranger can repeat it back to you.

Fill in this blank until it sounds right:

We help [who] get [result] by [how it works], or they [your guarantee].

If you can't get it that clean, you're not done. Keep cutting.

Step 2. Figure out exactly who you're selling to

All you're looking for here is one thing. Consistency.

Start with who you've already got

Consistency in the type of person buying.

Consistency in their pains, what they believe, and why they buy. That's it.

If you're coming from organic, you're already sitting on a goldmine.

Look at who shows up on your sales calls. Who's in your DMs. Who opts into your stuff.

The pattern's already there. Most people just never write it down.

Now get out of your silo

Here's where it gets dangerous.

The only buyers you know are the ones who already found their way to you. They walked into your world.

You never went out and found them.

So if you build your whole ad strategy off the people already in your bubble, you're running blind. You're talking to a tiny slice of the market and assuming it's everybody.

You, stuck in your own silo.

It's not.

There are way bigger pockets of these people out there, asking the same questions, and you've never seen them.

Getting out of that bubble is what market research is for.

Here's where you go look:

- ☐ Your own channels first. Comments, DMs, replies, call notes.
- ☐ The forums. Reddit, YouTube comments, Facebook groups. Anywhere they talk with no salesperson in the room. Their words become your ad copy.
- ☐ Your competitors, but be careful. Don't assume they know what they're doing just because they're spending. The only real signal is length. Six months running means it works. Spun up yesterday means it's a guess.

Where to go dig.

Put it all in one doc

Dump everything into one document.

You want to understand this person better than they understand themselves. Here's what goes in it:

- ◆ Who they are. The demographic, the role, the situation they're in.
- ◆ What they actually want. The real result, not the surface one.
- ◆ What they're scared of. Their objections and the fears underneath them.
- ◆ What they believe. The limiting beliefs keeping them stuck.
- ◆ What they've already tried, and why it didn't work.
- ◆ Their exact words. Pulled straight from your research, copy and paste.

One doc that everything else hangs off.

This doc becomes the anchor for everything. (I pulled this idea from Ravi over at Scaling with Systems. Shout out.)

Here's why it matters so much.

One document means everybody producing your marketing is working off the same words.

You feed it to your copywriter. You feed it to AI. You feed it to your sales team.

Now every ad, every email, every call is saying the exact same thing. That consistency is most of the battle.

It won't be perfect the first time. It's not supposed to be.

You'll sharpen it as the ad data comes in. But you need version one before you write a single ad.

Step 3. Turn that into ads

Everybody wants the same result. They just show up with a different story.

This is the fun part, and it's where the research pays off.

Your job is to meet each story where it's at.

Rank your angles, most common at the top.

- ☐ List out every angle that showed up in your research.
- ☐ Rank them by how often they came up. The one that showed up most is angle one. The market is telling you what it cares about, in order. Listen to it.
- ☐ Turn each angle into its own ad.
- ☐ Then break the big ones down even smaller. Each little version is another ad.

Say I'm talking to people who want to run ads.

Angle one is the guy who plateaued on organic and knows ads are the next step.

Angle two is the guy who got burned by an agency that dropped the ball and can't trust anyone now.

Angle three is the guy stuck at 10K a month in spend who can't break through.

Same product. Three totally different conversations.

That's the whole engine. Angle, ad, repeat. Don't overthink it.

Step 4. Pick your funnel

Start with whatever your team already knows how to run.

Before the ads go live, you need something to point them at.

Don't overcomplicate this one.

If you've already got a funnel that's converting, start there.

Even if it's not the one I'd pick on paper, your team already knows how to close on it. That's less risk.

Starting fresh from organic? Here are the funnels I'd actually use:

- ◆ Call funnel. Dead simple to set up and crushes on organic. This is where I'd start.
- ◆ Webinar. Gets easier on paid, because the nurture warms people up for you before the call.
- ◆ Low ticket funnel. It works, but I wouldn't start here unless it's already converting for you.

☐ Already converting on a funnel? Start there.

☐ Starting from scratch? Go call funnel or webinar.

☐ Get some spend behind it. Even 20K a month proves ads put money back in your pocket.

One thing you don't want to do is make your team learn a brand new sales process on day one.

The second you do that, you're back at zero with nothing but some consumer data.

Start with what's already working.

Step 5. Launch and solve one thing at a time

| Spend money to make money, and fix the leaks one at a time.

Alright, now you launch. I've said this in a hundred videos.

Running ads is just spending money to make more money, and fixing the leaks one at a time on the way there.

Your metrics

The leaks are your metrics.

CPM, click-through rate, show rate, close rate, collection rate.

Keep the list short and clean so you can actually think straight.

The short list of what you're solving for.

When you first launch, your numbers are going to look ugly.

That's not failure, that's you paying to learn.

You spend, you learn, you fix one thing, you spend more, you fix the next thing.

At some point you cross into profitable while you're still solving. Then boom, you break out and scale.

Solve through the dip, then it breaks out. (Shout out to Mr. Haynes for this one.)

The order you solve in

- ☐ First, who's actually coming through the funnel? If everybody hitting your calls is broke or wrong for your offer, nothing else matters. Fix this before you touch anything else.

- ☐ Then find the constraint. Ask one question: which metric, if I fix it, gets me the biggest result for the least effort? Maybe CPM and close rate are both rough, but CPM's easier to move. Cool, put everything on CPM.
- ☐ Solve that one. Then move to the next one. Rinse and repeat.

Don't try to fix everything at once.

One thing at a time, over and over, until you're profitable.

It's a science experiment. That's all it is.

Step 6. Scale

| Once it's working, turn the knob up. Don't sit there tweaking.

This is where I watch new advertisers shoot themselves in the foot, nine times out of ten.

You hit a 4 or 5x return, and instead of pushing, you sit there and tweak every little thing first.

Wrong move.

As long as you can stomach the return, the second you're profitable, start spending more. Right then.

- ☐ Hitting 4 or 5x? Turn the spend up. Now.
- ☐ Keep solving problems as you grow, not before you grow.
- ☐ Stop fiddling with tiny tweaks.

You make way more money turning the knob up than perfecting a machine that's already working.

Get profitable, then scale. Don't sit on it.

The short version

If you forget everything else, here's the whole thing on one page:

1. Sharpen your offer until a stranger gets it in one sentence.
2. Find the pattern in your buyers, then get out of your bubble and research.
3. Rank your angles, turn each one into an ad.
4. Run the funnel your team already knows, or a call funnel or webinar.
5. Launch, get the right people in, then fix one metric at a time.
6. Hit 4 or 5x and scale hard. Stop fiddling.

That's the simplified version of launching ads from zero.

Now, of course, there's a lot more nuance to this, but this will give you a solid foundation to get going.

And remember,

Keep it stupid simple.
